As the state Department of Public Health and the attorney general's office continue investigations into widespread EMT training fraud, experts warn lawsuits could soon follow.

About 200 emergency medical technicians in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, including state-certified instructors who worked in Billerica and Lowell, allegedly bought and submitted false recertification records to their employers, according to DPH. The majority of cases under investigation stemmed from anonymous tips brought to the attention of DPH officials.

"These are just the cases we know about," said Jennifer Manley, a DPH spokeswoman. "We sent out a memo to municipalities asking them to give us any further information if they had any. We don't know when (the investigation) is going to end but we're very disturbed by this and we're going to keep going until we are satisfied the problem has been resolved."
